SUBJECT: Employee Retention Analysis & Strategic Recommendations

Executive Summary Employee turnover represents a significant hidden cost in hiring, training, and lost productivity. To address this, we analyzed our historical HR records to identify the hidden patterns that precede an employee's departure. We have developed a predictive system capable of identifying flight-risk employees before they leave, allowing HR to pivot from reactive replacements to proactive retention.

Key Drivers of Employee Attrition Our analysis revealed that salary is not the primary reason employees leave. Instead, turnover is strongly driven by burnout and early-career friction. The top three factors are:

- Excessive Overtime: Employees who regularly work overtime are at the absolute highest risk of leaving. Burnout is our most critical vulnerability.
- The "Two-Year" Danger Zone: We are losing a disproportionate amount of talent during their first and second years at the company. If an employee stays past year three, their likelihood of leaving drops dramatically.
- Departmental Strain (Sales): The Sales department, specifically the Sales Representative role, experiences a turnover rate nearly double that of Research & Development.

Strategic Recommendations Based on these findings, we recommend implementing the following targeted initiatives:

Overtime Audits & Caps: HR should work with department heads—especially in Sales—to implement a strict review of overtime distribution. If overtime is unavoidable, we must introduce mandatory recovery days to prevent burnout-driven exits.

Revamp the First-Year Experience: Because the first two years are critical, we should implement mandatory "stay interviews" at the 6-month, 12-month, and 18-month marks. This will allow managers to catch disengagement early, clarify role expectations, and course-correct before the employee decides to quit.

System Limitations for HR Awareness While our predictive system is highly effective at identifying at-risk employees based on workplace patterns, it cannot account for sudden external life events (e.g., unexpected family emergencies or macroeconomic shifts). It should be used as a guiding tool to prioritize HR outreach, not as a replacement for human conversation.
